Luxation Injuries: Management and Long-Term Prognosis

Frederic Barnett, DMD is the vice chair of dental medicine and chair and program director of postdoctoral endodontics at the Albert Einstein Medical Center in Philadelphia, PA.

The prevalence of dental injuries has been shown to occur in approximately 10–35% of children between the ages of 7 and 10 worldwide. These injuries occur primarily in the anterior region of the mouth. Maintenance of the vital pulp and an intact periodontal ligament following trauma are critically important for these young patients as tooth loss can result in devastating and long-term clinical repercussions. Dental trauma often involves damage to the teeth as well as their supporting structures. The management and consequences of these injuries are multifactorial, and knowledge of the interrelating healing patterns of these tissues is essential. Ankylosis and replacement resorption are frequently diagnosed following avulsion and severe intrusive luxation. The treatment of ankylosed permanent incisors following dental trauma presents a particular clinical challenge when it involves a growing child due to the high risk of infraposition and underdevelopment of the alveolar bone. New approaches for the treatment of ankylosed teeth, including decoronation and bone augmentation for the preservation of alveolar ridge prior to permanent prosthetic reconstruction, will be presented.

Learning Objectives:

- Understand the etiology, diagnosis, and differentiation of root resorption
- Apply current therapeutic guidelines for luxated and avulsed permanent teeth
- Develop a comprehensive approach for the treatment of traumatically injured teeth and associated complications
