Management of sloped ridges: Graft and graft-less options

Ridge atrophy is a natural consequence of tooth loss.

Management of deficient alveolar ridges is a common challenge in implant dentistry. This lecture will focus on modern treatment options for management of sloped alveolar ridges, aimed to maximize tissue quality at the implant interface with the oral cavity, for creation of a stronger biologic seal, more resistant to peri-implantitis. The importance of implant design, graft material selection and application will be reviewed and discussed.

Course objectives:

- To understand the importance of implant quality and design
- To select graft materials based on specific properties and applications
- To understand the advantages of sloped implants
